Stock Image. Critical Companion to F. Guthrie follows Tylor in emphasizing the intellectual aspects of religion, in regarding animism as an important matter that needs to be analyzed and explained relative to 'the course of mental history,' and in conceptualizing religion as universally founded on certain panhuman psychological processes.

It offers a theory of religious rituals systems as well as a framework for a larger Paul Davis. Only one of the seventeen theories discussed in the present volume has grown out of empirical work on a religious site Tweed while another one has remote origins in an earlier fieldwork project Rappaport and a third theory has emerged from reflections on the meaning of neolithic excavation sites Lewis-Williams. Non-human phenomena are, in short, anthropomorphized. Paul Davis. Guthrie himself declares that his theory 'is indebted most to [Robin] Horton and intellectualism' Ritual as language.
